A particular business company has more than 100 field sales representatives who sell the industrial products. Sales of these products require close work with buyers to determine their product needs, so nearly all sales representatives are college graduates in scientific discipline. Other product lines of the company, such as consumer products, are sold by a separate sales group.

Recently, the firm established a new company wide control and report system using a larger computer. The system doubles the amount of time the industrial sales representatives spend filling out forms and supplying information that can be fed into the computer. They estimate that they now spend as much as two hours daily processing records. and they complain that they now have inadequate time for sales effort A field sales manager commented, 'Morale has declined as a result of these new controls and reports. Sales is rewarding, gratifying profession that is based on individual effort. Sales representatives are happy when they are making sales, since this directly affects their income and sell recognition. The more time they spend with the reports the less time they have to make sales. As a result they can see their income and recognition declining, and thus they find themselves resisting changes.'

Questions:

1. Comment on the sales manager's analysis.
2. What alternative approaches to this situation do you recommend ? Give reasons.
